1	like to watch it again	6/5/2019 3:00 PM
2	Sounds like a refreshing new take on things. Focus on the important, high risk topics, and keep an open eye on the technical innovations that are, as Brian mentioned, democratizing measuring.	6/5/2019 2:36 PM
3	I'm very confused to be honest about the content. There is mention about new products and services, this is not a new idea at the AOLS. This has been talked about yet the Council reverted to old, out dated rationale with the Sketches Bulletin. Why discuss ethics or focusing on high risk work yet not allow us to actually provide products that our clients ask for within our own professional judgement? The first task at your next council meeting should be to repeal the sketches bulletin and allow us some flexibility. You don't need to make this complicated just do it, if not it is obvious the strategic plan is not being followed and this whole exercise was a big waste of time and effort. Nothing makes us look less professional than telling a client we have no flexibility in the product we have to provide them, of course they go to a technical firm to get what they need. If you want to improve our image with the public crack down on the crappy surveyors and allow us ethical ones to work.	6/5/2019 2:31 PM

3	On the PYB, I really do think their website offers useful advice that informs the public, and there is no reason why our AOLS website couldn't do as well.	6/5/2019 2:36 PM
4	About protect your boundary which infringing the code of ethics Al Jeraj and Brayan Maloney didn't comment. Which I believe is soliciting imagine every survey company put Adds to attract clients which is not protecting public. It takes color of commercial and business which has to be service to the public.	6/5/2019 2:28 PM

4	Maybe some sort of regular communications channel between other professional bodies that make use of our products and the AOLS, eg. Realtors, Civil Engineers, Architects could be established for mutual learning and benefit. (Lawyers seemed to be covered by Four Point Learning with seminars open to both OLSs and LLBs.)	6/5/2019 2:36 PM
